'The Problem' in Moscow

Among staff members at the American Embassy on Moscow's Tchaikovsky Street, it's known as "The Problem." For five months, U.S. diplomats have complained openly about Soviet microwave radiation aimed at jamming the listening devices on the embassy roof. Last week, State Department doctors took the unusual step of ordering a pair of 3-year-old embassy children home to the U.S. for medical tests. The two are daughters of diplomats who live in the embassy compound, and both are suffering from blood disorders. In Washington, officials refused to link the girls' medical ailments to microwaves. In Moscow, the microwave radiation continued.
